Our graduate program is led by faculty committed to both serious humanistic research and innovative classroom teaching. Since it was first established in 1961, our doctoral program has become a focal point for Italian studies in North America and has provided advanced training for many students who are now leaders in their fields. To date our graduates have had highly successful career placements in colleges, universities, cultural foundations, and businesses despite declining economic conditions in higher education.

Strong allied programs in European studies, comparative literature, art history, film studies, medieval studies, and gender studies, among others, provide unequaled opportunities for the inquisitive mind.

Our faculty offer a broad range of expertise, with research ranging from an exploration of the superhero in modern literature to a digital edition of Petrarch’s Canzoniere.

Come join us!

We offer financial aid in the form of fellowships and Associate Instructor positions, generally in five-year packages for students who successfully complete the MA degree and continue on to the PhD. In addition to teaching experience, we offer research assistant positions through which students collaborate with our internationally recognized scholars.

IU-Bloomington is a great place to study, with a beautiful campus and vibrant scholarly environment. Our students benefit from a wide array of resources, including those of the IU Cinema, the Lilly Library of rare books and manuscripts, and the Kinsey Institute for research related to sexuality. In addition, IU library holdings are among the largest in the nation, and our award-winning Information Technology services facilitate cutting-edge research and teaching.
