DEPARTMENT OF FRENCH AND ITALIAN

The Politics of Regional Language: Dialect Literature in Italian Periodicals During Fascism

Dissertation Defense: Mary Migliozzi

Tuesday, May 6, 2014 12:30pm Indiana Memorial Union State Room West

Existing studies have shed much light on the language policies of Italian fascism as well as on its literary censorship and the gray areas and inconsistencies often characterized that the regime's control over printed texts. From both types of studies emerges a complex picture of what has been more broadly defined as the regime's cultural politics, which sought to establish a uniform definition of italianità. The question of national identity is crucial to any discussion of fascist cultural politics and also to debates concerning the use of standard and vernacular language. The 1930s saw policies prohibiting the use of regional and local dialects in education and in print, although an abundance of primary sources demonstrates that dialect continued to be used in print in periodicals as well as in books. In order to better understand the role that language plays in the cultural politics of such works, my study examines six periodical publications that regularly or primarily published in dialect: Filippo Fichera's Rivista italiana di Letteratura dialettale and its supplement La Sampogna, Aldo Spallicci's La Piê, the Genoese weekly II Successo, the monthly A Compagna, and the tri-weekly Il Rugantino in dialetto romanesco.

Though the regime opposed publication in dialect on the grounds that it was divisive and anti-unitary, dialect texts do not necessarily show a strict adherence to regionalism in opposition to fascist nationalism. Rather, they constantly negotiate the role of dialect in the discourse on culture through their choice of texts, their politics, and often through articles that directly and explicitly justify their linguistic choices. Fichera's publications and Il Rugantino show differing ways of using the rhetoric of popolarità and prestige to reconcile dialect with fascist ideologies. La Piê, Il Successo, and A Compagna demonstrate the political implications of refusing to justify dialect works in terms of fascist nationalism. The content in and about dialect in these newspapers and magazines reveals the complex role that language plays in their construction of political, national and regional identity, and the fascist regime's complex and often contradictory relationship with dialects.

COMMITTEE

Andrea Ciccarelli, Chair French and Italian

> Massimo Scalabrini French and Italian, Renaissance Studies

Marco Arnaudo French and Italian

Julie Auger French and Italian Linguistics

If you would like to attend, please contact the Graduate Secretary, Casey Green, at 812-855-1088 or fritgs@indiana.edu

INDIANA UNIVERSITY